Chinese food in America, for example, is Darwinian, says Lee. It was a way for Chinese cooks to survive in America and earn a living. It started with the invention of chop suey in the late 1800s, followed by fortune cookies around the time of World War II, and the pervasive General Tso's Chicken, in the 1970s.

It goes without saying, but 100 years ago, America looked very different from the way it looks now. World War I had ended recently, the economy was exploding (at least until the beginning of the Great Depression in 1929), and the 18th Amendment had outlawed the production of alcohol. Immigrant communities were bringing their food and culture to U.S. shores, and women had recently earned the ...
